Steam is mitted successively to the six cylinders and agree from the steam chest, three pictons being stantly in action at different points of the stroke, thereby imparting a uniform rolling | ble and notion to the conical disk, which is stead children. ied at its center by a ball and socket joint, pistons and protects the ball and nocket with the a from deals. There is a flat circular ring, a scientions valve which receives motion from an eccentrie carried by a shaft which passes through the centre of the steam chest, which ring slides steam tight but perfectly free between the port thee and a balance plate that prevents the steam pressure from acting on the valve and makes its movements nearly frictionless. The steam is admitted to and fills an annular space in the steam chest outside the circumference of the valve ring, the eccentric motion of which alternately opens and closes all the steam ports. selv admitting steam to the cylinders, from which it again escapes to an exhaust chamber formed by the inside of the valve ring, and thence through openings into the body of the engine, and is finally discharged by an exhaust pipe. The engine is constructed to cut off steam at half stroke but the cut-off can be altered to any point, from one-tenth to full stroke.
